BOLDNESS.

It is probably true that the cause of truth suffers less from indiscretion than covardies. Imputedence, with good heart, will be pardoned; but a want of courage newer. Luther had bis fullent—he was many times injudicious, but Luther lives—his faults died. Perhaps there is a tithic time no virtue more important to the friends of enuncipation than Baldness. They will be assilled, traduced, abused, slandered; their rights will be restricted so far as possible, and they will need to be bold. The leading motives with their opposers will not be to injure them directly, but by these to prevent them from presecuting their cause. DEATH OF CILLEY—THE CONTRAST.
BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURSEY.
The mother sat beside har fire.
Well trimmed it was and bright;
While loudly moaned the forest pines,
Amid that wintry might.

se heard them not—those wind-swept For o'er a scroll she hung, nat bore her husband's voice of love, As when that love was young.

And thrice her son, beside her knee, Besought her favoring eye. And thrice her lisping daughter spoke, Before she made reply.

O, little daughter, many a kiss Lurks in this treasured line; And boy, a father's counsel fond, And tender prayers are thine. Thou hast his proud and arching brow;
Thou hast his eye of flame;
And be the purpose of thy soul,
Thy onward course the same.

Then as she drew them to her arms, Down her fair check would glide A tear that shone like diamond spark, The tear of love and pride.

She took her infant from its rest, And laid it on her knee: 'Thou never yet hast seen thy sire,' But he'll be proud of thee.

Yes; he'll be proud of thee, my dove, The lily of our line, I know what eyes of blue he loves, And such an eye is thine.

Where is my father gone, mamma, Why does he stay so long?' He's far away in Congress hall, Amid the noble throng.

He's in the lofty Congress ball, To swell the big debate, And help to frame those righteons laws, That make our land so great.

But ere the earliest violets bloom, You in his arms shall be; So go to rest, my children dear, And pray for him and me.'

The snow flakes rear'd their drifted mound, They buried nature deep, Yet naught within that peaceful home, Stirred the soft down of sleep.

For lightly, like an angel's dream, The trance of slumber fell. Where innocence and holy love Entwined their guardian spell.

Another eve-another scroll,
Wot ye what words it said?
Two words, two fearful words it bore,
The DUEL! AND THE DEAD!!

The duel !—and the dead !—how dark Was that young mother, seye, How fearful her protracted swoon— How wild her piercing cry !

There's many a wife whose bosom's lord, Is in its prime laid low— Engulfed beneath the watery main, While bitter tempests blow.

Or crushed smid the battle field, Where crimson rivers flow, Yet they know not the dreadful pang, That dregs her cup of wo.

Who lies so powerless on her couch, Transfixed by sorrow's string; Her infant in its nurse's arms Like a forgotten thing.

A dark haired hoy is at her side, He lifts his eager eye—
'Mother, they say my father's dead, How did my father die?'

Again the spear-point in her breast!
Again that sbrick of pain!
Child, thou hast riven thy mother's soul;
Speak not those words again.

Speak not those words again, my son?'
What boots the fruitless care?
They're written whereso'er she turns—
On ocean, earth or air.

They're scared upon her shrinking heart,
That burst beneath its doom.
The due!! and the dead! they haunt
The threshold of her tomb.

So, through her brief and weary years, That broken heart she bore, And on her pale and drooping brow The smile sat never more.
